

A Monologue from

The Incomplete Life
& Random Death
Of Molly Denholtz

by
Ian McWethy

Nina, 17, Molly's ex-girlfriend, is recalling her break-up with Molly last fall. She recounts her break-up with Michael, who also dated Nina.

NINA

Break ups in general are so strange. We spent... so much time together. For a year. We talked everyday and I told her things about me I haven't told anyone. And won't tell anyone. And she said things to me. Really... personal things. And also like really dumb things. We had these... really insanely stupid inside jokes. All these bits and weird nicknames we'd give each other. And if I told you about them... A. They would make no sense at all. And B. Would be so cutesy and obnoxious that you'd just vomit. Right here. In my face you'd just vomit cause it was so... gross and we'd talk like weird babies and... anyway, that stuff is for me. And her. And I just didn't... when we broke up I didn't think about how alone I would be. And I guess I... I didn't really think we'd get back together. But I thought... well at some point maybe we'll be friends. And we can talk about... what happened between us and maybe I won't be so angry. I mean she was... my first girlfriend. She was my first a lot of things and... I know myself so much better because of her and I just wish... I never really told her that you know? I feel like she died and she didn't even know... any of the good things I felt. Just the angry, bitter stuff I told her at the end.